LINCOLN'S SON ADMITS RAILROAD SLAVERY

Robert T. Lincoln, Chairman of Pullman Company, Tells U. S. Industrial Relations Commission That Company Doesn't Pay Living Wages—Porters Depend on Tips.

"Thank God, we live in a country where workingmen have the right to strike."—Abraham Lincoln in speech to striking workingmen in Massachusetts.

Robert Todd Lincoln, full-blooded son of Abraham Lincoln, civil war president of the United States, testified yesterday before the U. S. industrial relations commission at Washington.

He is chairman of the board of directors of the Pullman company, and he gave the figures showing how this Chicago corporation has squeezed from railroad travelers more money in profits than its total assets amount to. At the same time he told how it has forced the traveling public to make up the living wage to the negro porters through tips.

The Marshall Field estate, the Potter Palmers, Mrs. George Pullman herself, and all the chief owners of the Pullman company, live in Chicago. So the newspapers are all handling R. T. Lincoln and his testimony yesterday softly without telling any of the rough, important truths that stand from under it.

Lincoln said it doesn't affect the manhood of porters in any way at all to accept tips, nor to black shoes and brush clothes and perform duties as body servants to the travelers on sleeping cars. He read the amazing figures on the immense profits of the company just as though his father had not said sixty years ago:
